the labour needed to work the demesne. The peasants (and their children after them) were legally serfs, bound to the soil. These bipartite, serf-run estates superficially resemble the classic manors of the early Middle Ages but differ from them in that the new estates were producing primarily for commercial markets.

Peasants and Lords in the Medieval English Economy

Peasants in the Middle Ages were in a relationship of submission with the owner of the land or with the Lord who offered them a degree of protection and with work in exchange for a contribution. In most cases, the contributions they needed to offer to the lord consisted of a part of the harvest.
